A NOTE ON Methodology

This audit was conducted through direct observation of the Undress Code Instagram account (@undresscode) across a 60-day window (June–August 2026), covering approximately 40 feed posts, Reels, and available Stories content. Observations are grounded in publicly visible engagement data, supplemented by 2026 industry benchmarks for premium womenswear accounts in the 150,000–250,000 follower tier. The perspective here is that of someone who has spent time inside visual productions for premium brands: on-set experience across European and Asian markets informs both the technical and the editorial reading of the content reviewed.

BRAND OVERVIEW

What Undress Code has built

*Warsaw.
Polish sewing rooms.
French and Italian fabrics.
A woman who writes her own story.*

*The product is credible.
The identity is specific.
The community is real.*

Undress Code is not a brand that is still finding its footing. It is a brand that has arrived somewhere significant: 187,000 followers, a blue verification badge, distribution at Harrods, Galeries Lafayette, KaDeWe, Illum, Breuninger, and Revolve, press coverage in Vogue and Elle across Europe and Asia, and organic celebrity wear from figures at the scale of Taylor Swift.

What this audit addresses is the next threshold: the moment when instinctive brand-building must become intentional brand architecture. Not a correction of what exists, but a reading of where the brand is already going, and a proposal for how to get there faster, with more clarity and more consistency.

Brand Positioning

The brand's philosophy centres on one statement: made for women who write their own stories. Everything else (the no-overproduction commitment, the in-house Warsaw design, the plastic-free packaging, the range that moves freely between lingerie, ready-to-wear, bodysuits, loungewear, and swimwear) flows from this positioning. It is a premium-to-luxury brand by distribution and by product. The communication must now earn that same positioning on every platform it occupies.

Section 02

Collection 2026/2027

Platform: Instagram (Feed posts, Reels, Stories)

Account handle: @undresscode

Follower base: 187,000 (August 2026)

Content reviewed: approximately 40 posts across feed and Reels, June–August 2026, including verbatim captions

Benchmarking: 2026 industry data for premium fashion/lingerie accounts in the 150,000-250,000 follower tier

AUDIT SCOPE

Four Dimensions under review

- Quantitative performance patterns, including format distribution, posting cadence, and engagement behaviour across content types.
- Visual analysis of the feed as a system, not as a collection of individual images.
- Copy and caption analysis covering tone, structure, and activation language.
- Strategic opportunity mapping across four specific areas identified through close reading of the account.

QUANTITATIVE Analysis

Typical post: 97-228 likes.
Strong performer: 290-871 likes.
Top performer: 1,441 likes (Shadow Play lace bra post).

The gap between a typical post and the top performer is not incremental: it is structural. Posts that reach 871 or 1,441 likes do not simply have better images. They have a different relationship between image, caption, and audience expectation. Identifying what that relationship is and building it into a repeatable logic is where the highest leverage exists.

Three consistent patterns emerge from the performance data:

Format	Observed share	Primary function
Static Image	~40%	Product and editorial
Carousel	~25%	Lookbook and collection
Reel	~25%	Mood, lifestyle, collaborations
Stories	Regular but ephemeral	Press, promotions, creator reshares

Reels output has increased deliberately and the direction is correct. In 2026, Reels generate an average organic reach rate of approximately 30.81%, compared to substantially lower rates for static posts. The question is not whether to make more Reels but what those Reels are doing narratively once they reach a new audience.

Creator collaborations consistently outperform brand-produced content. The Reel posted both by @undresscode and @agnieszkakawiorska reached 154 likes; the Puglia birthday post with community caption reached 871 likes. The performance signal is clear and consistent across the audit window.

Lingerie detail posts significantly outperform lifestyle and ready-to-wear posts. The Shadow Play bra reached 1,441 likes. The lace slip reached 681 likes. Both combined elevated caption language with strong macro-detail imagery.

Posts with longer, more narrative captions tend to outperform posts with short or purely descriptive captions, when the caption quality is high. This challenges the common assumption that brevity always wins on Instagram.

VISUAL ANALYSIS

The Feed as a System

The feed in its current state: four observations from the screenshots

Looking across the full audit window as captured in the four feed screenshots:

The product photographs with genuine distinction.

Silks, mesh, lace, structured knits; fabrics with inherent visual texture that translates well to screen. Individual images, at their best, communicate a feeling: the silhouette at golden hour in the field, the woman against the rocks in the black mesh bodysuit, the macro detail of black lace against skin, the night shot of the printed slip skirt walking toward the sea. These are images that earn saves.

Colour is behaving like an instinct that has not yet been formalised.

Red appears in concentrated clusters across the feed: the long red dress at the market, the close-up of tomatoes, the red slip skirt, the red one-shoulder dress. Black anchors the majority of the feed. The monochrome dot pattern recurs with notable frequency. This is not a random palette: it is an emerging system that the brand is already using intuitively. Formalising it would give the feed a recognisable visual rhythm that rewards the returning viewer.

Two registers coexist without a bridge.

The editorial register (cinematic, composed, atmospheric) and the immediate register (mirror selfies in elevators, candid Warsaw street shots, creator captures) are both present and both valid. The brand's own positioning “made for women who write their own stories” demands both. A woman who writes her own story is not only one thing. The tension is not that the two registers exist: it is that they exist without a connecting thread that makes them feel like chapters of one story rather than content from two different accounts. This is the central visual observation of this audit.

The lingerie and ready-to-wear categories share the feed without a narrative that connects them.

A lace detail macro sits between a blazer shot and a cocktail dress. A bodysuit in the water appears next to an off-shoulder structured top. The brand spans categories that most competitors cannot: this breadth is an asset that the feed is not yet using as a storytelling advantage.

COPY ANALYSIS

Reading the real captions

WHAT WORKS:

- Five distinct registers — all valid, all correctly matched when used intentionally
- "Shadow Play" caption: character naming + contradiction + editorial close + CTA pause = 1,441 likes
- No hashtags: correct positioning signal for this segment
- Intimate shorthand ("something to spend your Sunday in"): earns DM shares

WHAT IS MISSING:

- Save prompt: absent across all five captions reviewed
- No framework governing which register to use when
- Seasonal narrative captions (Fall Feeling) occasionally outpace the image they are paired with

COPY ANALYSIS

Reading the real captions

THE SYSTEM QUESTION:

- Five caption registers exist: social recognition / editorial with CTA / atmospheric fragment / seasonal narrative / intimate shorthand
- Each is correct in isolation
- The gap is the absence of a logic that assigns each register to the right moment, consistently

THE NEXT CHAPTER

Four Strategic Observations

Observation	Why it Matters	Priority
The two-register feed lacks a bridge. Editorial and immediate content coexist without connective narrative tissue	The brand vision ("women who write their own stories") demands both registers — but without a bridge post, the feed reads as two accounts, not one multidimensional identity	HIGH
Colour behaves like an instinct, not a system. Red, black, and monochrome patterns cluster intuitively across the feed without a formalised seasonal architecture	Colour is one of the primary instant-recognition signals on Instagram. A defined seasonal colour chapter would reward returning viewers and build cumulative brand equity at scroll speed	HIGH
Geographic variety lacks emotional anchoring. Brazil, Puglia, Warsaw, Mediterranean all appear without a narrative logic that makes each location feel like a brand expression rather than a location tag	The 871-like Puglia birthday post demonstrates that emotional location language drives engagement. This instinct is present in creator captions but not yet in brand-produced content	MEDIUM/ HIGH
Lingerie and RTW share the feed without a narrative that connects them. The brand's breadth across categories is an asset that the feed does not yet use as storytelling	No competitor in this segment spans both categories credibly. A recurring two-layer editorial format would turn category breadth into a differentiating content advantage	MEDIUM

Four Strategic Observations

OBSERVATION 1 - THE BRIDGE POST

Production quality: non-negotiable. Subject matter: ordinary.

- One post per week designated in the content calendar
- Brief: garment present but incidental, moment specific and real
- Editorial register + human specificity = connective tissue between the two existing registers

OBSERVATION 2 - COLOUR CHAPTERS

The red cluster is already there. Formalise it.

- One dominant colour per 4–6 week period
- Introduced with a deliberate editorial opening post
- Appears across feed, Reels, and Stories cover frames throughout the chapter

OBSERVATION 3 - EMOTIONAL LOCATION

Not "Puglia, Italy." The kind of afternoon that makes you forget you had a plan.

- Caption does the work of the location tag, but emotionally rather than geographically
- 871-like Puglia post is the template: already done by a creator, not yet systematised in brand content

OBSERVATION 4 - THE TWO-LAYER FORMAT

The layer no one sees. The one everyone remembers.

- One two-layer post or carousel per month
- Caption names the relationship between the two pieces, not the pieces themselves
- Specific to Undress Code's product range, no competitor can replicate it

COPY FRAMEWORK

Building what Already Works

REGISTER	CONTEXT	LENGTH	MODEL
Editorial with CTA	Lingerie hero, new collection	Medium - long	Shadow Play caption
Intimate shorthand	Detail posts, night imagery	Under 10 words	“Something to spend your Sunday in”
Seasonal narrative	Collection launch, transitions	Long	Fall Feeling caption
Social recognition	Creator collaborations	One sentence	@mariaelena_groenewoud caption

Add one save prompt per week.
Match format to caption type.
The prompt does not need to be commercial to drive algorithmic distribution.

VISUAL DIRECTION BRIEF

The Brief is already in the data

TOP PERFORMER FORMULA

One garment. One body. One moment. Nothing competing.
Caption adds emotional information the image does not show.
Atmosphere: specific enough to feel personal.

THREE CONTENT DIRECTIONS

Macro-detail + editorial caption → 1,441 likes benchmark
Full-body environmental + emotional location → Grace Dress, Puglia post
Candid creator + social recognition caption → consistent outperformance

THE BRIDGE POST (NEW)

Production quality: high
Subject matter: ordinary
The gap between how carefully the image is made and how unremarkable its subject is; that is where the brand identity lives.

COMPETITOR BENCHMARK

Two Benchmarks, Two Lessons

@lovestoriesintimates

Love Stories Intimates

373K followers
Same positioning tension (aspiration + accessibility)

- What they resolved: caption voice strong enough to hold two registers as one identity
- Lesson for Undress Code: the narrative spine that makes visual variety feel intentional

Cou Cou Intimates

240K followers
Same challenge: making the immediate register feel as considered as the editorial

- What they resolved: a non-negotiable visual brief applied even to the most spontaneous-looking content
- Lesson for Undress Code: the bridge post mechanism: art direction that looks like it is not art direction

CONCLUSION

The System is what comes next

WHAT THE DATA SHOWS

Top performers share three structural characteristics

The brief for the next chapter is already embedded in the account's own best work

Four implementable proposals — zero additional budget required
